

Hong Kong: Sites Worth Seeing on Hong Kong Island (HK pt. 3)

1. Kowloon Fish Market: This fish market was incredible. There are a ton of different types of fish in this world and it was neat to see a glimpse of what was available in China. I loved the appreciation they had for the fish available. I've honestly never seen koi as large as what I saw in the Fish Market. Note: All of the fish I saw were to be pets, not food.
2. Kowloon Flower Market: I love flowers. I always have. I loved walking in and out of stores that were filled with beautiful flowers--some of which I have never seen. There was this type of Jasmine that I've never seen with which I'm absolutely enthralled. I will find it in the States!
3. Hong Kong Park: Oh my goodness this garden/park was gorgeous. There are a ton of koi and turtles that swim around in the little pond and they are all extremely cute. This was a nice sanctuary from the heat as there was a ton of shade and places to rest.
4. Lon Kwai Fong: Basically, this is the SoHo of Hong Kong. It was really neat. There were fun places to eat and was a fun escape from the traditional food.
5. Pedder Building: Around the corner from Lon Kwai Fong is the Pedder Building. It's a historic building that housed the giant Gap store mentioned in this post and the Mario Batali restaurant. The giant Abercrombie and Fitch is just across the street from this building. This building is seemingly in the Hong Kong version of a mini Times Square. There was a giant Cara Delevingne ad just outside of the window in the square. Also, the Coach store looked pretty dang impressive. Hong Kong loves Coach--that's for sure